

Eating disorders

What are eating disorders?

Eating disorders are often caused by feelings of intense unhappiness and depression. Developing an eating disorder can also be a sign that we have a complex relationship with our self-image. We may perceive that they allow us to gain some control over our emotions in a physical way, although eating disorders are actually very harmful physically and emotionally. Having an eating disorder is a sign that we need support with coping with things in life and working through emotional difficulties.

Eating disorders are complex and not all signs and symptoms will apply to us. There are a number of different eating disorders and signs that we might be suffering from one or more of them:

Anorexia nervosa:

Physical symptoms:

- Severe weight loss
- Periods stopping in girls (amenorrhoea)
- Hormonal changes in boys
- Stomach pains
- Constipation
- Dizziness
- Changes in sleeping patterns
- Feeling cold constantly

Behaviours:

- Lying about having eaten meals, and secrecy around eating in front of others
- Needing to control a situation
- Being in denial that there is an issue
- Wearing baggy clothes to disguise weight loss, or perceived weight gain
- Fixation with exercising excessively
- Isolating ourselves and wanting to be alone

We may also suffer from EDNOS; an 'Eating disorder not otherwise specified'. This means we may meet some but not all the diagnostic criteria for the above types of eating disorder, but do have disordered eating habits and emotional issues going on.

What causes eating disorders?

When suffering from an eating disorder it may actually be our underlying emotional issues and distress that are the catalysts for developing one, rather than the root issue being food itself.

When we transition from childhood and enter pre-pubescence or puberty, our bodies change and develop in new and sometimes overwhelming ways. These changes can be hard to come to terms with and adjust to. As a result of this, eating disorders are much more common in young people going through such huge image and life changes, including how we look and feel about ourselves.

Developing unhealthy eating patterns or dieting excessively when we are young can lead to more extreme disorders that we might use as a way to exert some control over our lives, or as a means to help us cope with stressful and upsetting times we face at this age. These can include exam stress, family breakdowns, bullying, friendship issues, and issues with dating and sex.

Eating disorders are commonly associated with young women, but increasingly, young men are also becoming more susceptible to developing a disorder.

Getting help

It can be very difficult to get better on our own once we are in the grip of an eating disorder, so it is really important to seek professional help as soon as possible. Remember, that in the extreme, people do die from eating disorders. Our loved ones don't want us to suffer in this way.

Doctors will assess our physical condition and refer us for appropriate help depending on the issues we are suffering. This can include seeing psychiatrists, psychologists, dieticians, nutritionists or counsellors, or a combination of these professions.

We don't have to see our GP alone; we can confide in a trusted loved one like a parent, carer, friend or teacher who can then help us speak to other people and our doctor about the problems we are facing. The more people who know, the more help we'll get to break the cycle of eating disorders.

Remember – we have done nothing to bring this on ourselves and any shame or guilt we feel is down to the eating disorder, not us. Don't let the disorder win.
